

The (Re)Gift Receipt

If gracious regifting is going to become just another acceptable way to give someone a gift without carrying any negative connotation, then we also have to be comfortable with the notion that there will be a time when a gift we have given someone will possibly get regifted, no matter how carefully it was chosen. On the other hand, if you are in doubt for any reason about the gift you are about to give, then the receipt on the back of this page may be welcome. You may want to begin including one with all of the gifts that you give, since that is another way to positively promote the practical benefits of regifting, even if the gift you are giving is already a regift. You may want to personalize it for your gift getter.

This gift was selected especially for you in celebration for this occasion.

(Fill in the blank)

---

This (Re)Gift Receipt has been given to you, along with your gift, to allow you the option to graciously regift this to anyone else, should you choose to do so, for any reason whatsoever, without guilt or shame.

Please feel free to pass this present on to another person under any circumstances, should they seem appropriate. Or, you may simply regift it to someone else whom you assume would be more appreciative. You are not under any obligation to inform me of your decision, as it is a gift for you and therefore yours to do with whatever you wish. I assure you that no matter what, I will still always be: (Fill in the blank)

---